Abstract

This paper presents a general system for camera movement upon which a wide variety of higher-level methods and applications can be built. In addition to the basic commands for camera placement, a key attribute of the CINEMA system is the ability to inquire information directly about the 3D world through which the camera is moving. With this information high-level procedures can be written that closely correspond to more natural camera specifications. Examples of some high-level procedures are presented. In addition, methods for overcoming deficiencies of this procedural approach are proposed.

1. Introduction

Camera control is an integral part of any 3D interface. In recent years a number of techniques for interactively specifying camera movement have been implemented or proposed. Each of these techniques has provided an interface for solving a problem for a particular domain, but all of them have remained independent making it impossible to use them across domains. These domains include keyframe based computer graphic animation techniques [8, 11], navigation of virtual environments [1, 2, 9, 12, 13], general 3D interaction [3, 12], automatic presentation [6] (in which computers generate a presentation), and synthetic visual narratives [4] (in which users author presentations). The CINEMA system described in this paper is a camera protocol that supports camera interface paradigms useful for all these domains, and provides a framework on which new interfaces can be developed.

The CINEMA system has a procedural interface for specifying camera movements relative to objects, events, and the general state of an environment. This task level approach enables the implementation of many common interactive metaphors and provides the ability to build higher level parameterized procedures that are reusable.

After a brief introduction to the problem, we will review related work in camera control, and then describe the CINEMA system, including the underlying support structure, the implementation, and several examples that demonstrate the system. Finally, we will discuss problems with this approach and suggest alternatives based upon our findings. We will work under the assumption that the actions in the environment are occurring independently from the observer. By making this assumption, the specification of the camera is independent from the 3D world, or can be treated as a window into the world that does not impact on it. This simplification is made by many of the existing camera interfaces reviewed in this paper, and although limiting, it is appropriate for a variety of situations.

An effective camera protocol must support interfaces that investigate/explore and interfaces that present/illustrate the 3D world. Although we have only begun to explore the uses of this system, there are many applications in which it could be used. In both scientific and architectural visualization there is the need to explore the virtual environment interactively and then to later author a set of illustrative camera movements to be shown to clients or colleagues. In electronic books there will be the need for a designer or knowledge based system to generate an interface through which a reader can view the information. In the entertainment industry an animator could use it to direct or specify camera movements. Live action film makers may use it to create interactive story boards of their scenes, plan camera movements, or even to generate commands for motion controlled cameras. Telebotonic or virtual environment applications require a task level camera
