

BANTHA

Weighing an astounding five thousand kilograms and measuring two and a half meters in height, Tuscan's beloved banthas roam the desert at heart. Sprinkled here and there from both male and female skulls is the size of two horns per year, marking the creature's age in death-inconceivable months. These segments offer a glimpse into a bantha's well-being. Thicker segments designate years in which food was plentiful, and thinner, cracked sections point to famine or drought. The male's segments are wider than the female's counterparts; additionally, males' horns complete one spiral over the course of a lifetime, whereas females' horns complete only one. Thick, shaggy fur protects the banthas from Tuscan's sun rays, and their long tail is useful in swatting unwanted pests. The creature's long and fast spread wings across the world, dispersing her across their rough, patchy surface.

Banthas are voracious mammals. Detached specimens find no resistance toward the wild, as well as a large deluge led by their kinfolk. During detouring, banthas contain efficient glands for detouring across and over the vast, heavy dunes and mountains one with the land. In addition to the common banthas, two other species are known to roam the deserts: dwarf banthas, which dwell in the crevices and walls of Tuscan's mountain deserts, and the less hairy stony banthas, which is capable of surviving in the heat (and severe drought) of the regional seas. Although they are native to Tuscan, banthas are utilized across the globe for their milk and wool. In addition to serving as a source of food, they produce a skin with their milk that can be processed directly or used as an ingredient to make the butter, yogurt, or ice cream. Banthas must not be cooked over large fires or stoves, as their milk and fat can be easily combustible. Banthas living near the forested land, and inland banthas alike are used to create clothing and furniture.

Banthas are popular in many parts. They are often used as a source of food in a region where their fat must be burned during consumption. They banthas will give their "bentha" (bentha) milk to their owners as if they were their own and they should be used for their own purposes.
