Abstract

Bipolar disorder (BD) is a debilitating psychiatric disorder characterized by recurrent depression, mania, and hypomania episodes. The interaction of psychological, neuropsychological, and neurobiological factors (cognitive, behavioral, and emotional) is implicated in the development and persistence of BD. The conceptualization of the BD has changed since the first description of mania-depressive illness. Although depression and mania episodes are defined by symptoms that have changed over the years, hypomania episodes have been described with fewer changes and their location is less clear than other episodes. Mania and hypomania episodes are considered dimensional as
