Dixon, A. L., Scheidegger, C., & McWhirter, J. J. (2009). The adolescent mattering experience: Gender variations in perceived mattering, anxiety, and depression. Journal of Counseling & Development, 87(3), 302–310. <https://doi-org.ric.idm.oclc.org/10.1002/j.1556-6678.2009.tb00111.x>

In this study the researchers sought to understand how adolescent boys and girls views on whether or not they matter contributed to differing levels of depression and anxiety. While finding that perceptions of mattering did not differ widely between boys and girls, they did find that it explained more of the variance in anxiety levels in boys than it did with the girls. The results of this study were presented in a clear manner with explanations of reliability and validity that make it sound. However they are upfront about the possible limitations especially due to sample size and proportions of males and females. This study indicates interesting findings relevant to exploring some of the possible factors that influence anxiety levels in children.

Cartwright-Hatton, S., Roberts, C., Chitsabesan, P., Fothergill, C., & Harrington, R. (2010). Systematic review of the efficacy of cognitive behaviour therapies for childhood and adolescent anxiety disorders. British Journal of Clinical Psychology, 43, 421–436. In this article the authors did a review of studies that utilized cognitive behavioral therapy techniques on children with anxiety. They wanted to look specifically for outcomes that led to remissions of the anxiety disorder. Their findings indicated that there was indeed a much higher rate of remission in the groups that received CBT, however they did note that this study did not focus on children under the age of 6. For certain age groups this study gives good insight into possible strategies for interventions and counseling of adolescents with anxiety disorders.
