Abstract

Background: In developing countries, the skin diseases are one of the most common causes of morbidity among children.

Aim: The aim was to determine the pattern of skin diseases among children attending the kindergartens in Baghdad and to determine the changes in this pattern five years after.

Methods: A descriptive, comparative study between two surveys five years apart was conducted.

Two surveys were done; one during 2011 and the second in 2016 including kindergarten children in eight randomly chosen kindergartens in Baghdad. The total number of children was 216. Number of children enrolled in each survey was 108. Children were assessed by history and examination performed by dermatologist.

Results: In the first survey; the noninfectious diseases outnumber the infectious diseases; with pityriasis alba being the most common noninfectious disease and impetigo contagiosum being the most common infectious disease.

In the second survey; the infectious diseases outnumber the noninfectious diseases; with scabies being the most common infectious disease and atopic dermatitis being the most common noninfectious disease.

Conclusion: There is a shift in the dermatological disease pattern among kindergarten children from non infectious towards infectious diseases, with a noticed increase in the frequency of scabies and molluscum contagiosum.

Key words: Infectious skin diseases, Iraqi children, kindergarten, comparative study.

INTRODUCTION

In developing countries, skin diseases are one of the most common causes of morbidity especially among children.⁽¹⁾ In Iraq; few if any published studies were conducted to determine the prevalence and pattern of skin diseases among children.

The aim of this study was to determine the pattern of dermatological diseases among children attending the kindergartens in Baghdad and to determine the changes in this pattern in five years interval.

PATIENTS AND METHODS

A descriptive comparative study consist of two surveys five years apart was conducted; the first survey was done during 2011 and the second one in 2016 including kindergartens' children in four randomly chosen kindergartens in each district in Baghdad by using stratified sampling through considering two district Al-Karkh and Al-Risafa and each district consider as two zones; one of medium to high social class and one of medium to low social class in each zone we take two kindergartens one governmental and the other private; in order to avoid the social class and economic status selection bias. The influence of seasonal variation was avoided through taking the samples in the same month which was March. Children below three years or above five years old were excluded. Total number of children enrolled was 216. Number of children included in each survey
