A Final Reckoning George Alfred Henty, 2020-04-29 Mrs Ellison had at her first arrival in the village three years before done much to give her a good start by ordering that all articles of use for the house in which she dealt should be purchased of her and she highly approved of the energy and independence of the young widow But lately there had been an estrangement between the squire s wife and the village shopkeeper Mrs Ellison whose husband owned all the houses in the village as well as the land surrounding it was accustomed to speak her mind very freely to the wives of the villagers She was kindness itself in cases of illness or distress and her kitchen supplied soups jellies and nourishing food to all who required it but in return Mrs Ellison expected her lectures on waste untidiness and mismanagement to be listened to with respect and reverence She was then at once surprised and displeased when two or three months before having spoken sharply to Mrs Whitney as to the alleged delinquencies of Reuben she found herself decidedly though not disrespectfully replied to The other boys are always set against my Reuben Mrs Whitney said because he is a stranger in the village and has no father and whatever is done they throw it on to him The boy is not a bad boy ma m not in any way a bad boy He may get into mischief like the rest but he is not a bit worse than others not half as bad as some of them and those who have told you that he is haven t told you the truth Mrs Ellison had not liked it She was not accustomed to be answered except by excuses and apologies and Mrs Whitney s independent manner of speaking came upon her almost as an act of rebellion in her own kingdom She was too fair however to withdraw her custom from the shop but from that time she had not herself entered it Reuben was a source of anxiety to his mother but this had no reference to his conduct She worried over his future The receipts from the shop were sufficient for their wants and indeed the widow was enabled from time to time to lay by a pound against bad times but she did not see what she was to do with the boy Almost all the other lads of the village of the same age were already in the fields and Mrs Whitney felt that she could not much longer keep him idle The question was what was she to do with him That he should not go into the fields she was fully determined and her great wish was to apprentice him to some trade but as her father had recently died she did not see how she was to set about it
