The contents of trace elements (metals) in sediments of both natural origin and anthropogenic impurities depend primarily on the sediment grain size (Fig. 1). Fine-grained sediments such as silts and clays contain considerably more metals than sands as they are bound mainly by clay minerals and organic matter, and by iron and manganese hydroxides. An elevated content of the sand fraction (>0.063 mm) effects the decrease in absolute content of metals in the whole sample.

If you wish to compare metal concentrations in sediments of different grain size in order to localise polluted areas where metals occur with concentrations higher than normal for the given area, it is important to apply a normalised procedure, i.e. one that enables you to eliminate the effect of deposit particle size on the chemical component content. The simplest way is to separate the sand fractions (>0.063 mm) from the sample before its chemical analysis. This method, however simple to perform, is effective only for sandy-silty sediments. For sands, the content of fractions finer than 0.063 mm is usually very low, so it is difficult to achieve a suitable amount of the material. For silty-clayey sediments, the content of sand fractions is so low that it does not affect the results of the analyses. The separation of the finest fractions from, for example, 0.016 mm or 0.004 mm by using depositional methods, as is sometimes applied, is labour-consuming. Therefore, there are procedures of normalisation used which refer to the total content of a given element in the sample but which are not divided into separated fractions to the component of the reference, the total content of which in the tested sediment is not related to the effect of man-made pollution. The normalisation makes it possible to compare specimens of different grain size and to determine any man-made effect on the contents of chemical components.

Stable Isotopes in High Temperature Geological Processes John W. Valley, Hugh P. Taylor, James R.

O'Neil, 2018-12-17 Volume 16 of Reviews in Mineralogy introduces to high temperature stable isotope geochemistry and should provide an entry into the pertinent literature as well as some understanding of the basic concepts and potential applications The first three chapters focus on the theory and experimental data base for equilibrium disequilibrium and kinetics of stable isotope exchange reactions among geologically important minerals and fluids The fourth chapter discusses the primordial oxygen isotope variations in the solar system prior to formation of the Earth along with a discussion of isotopic anomalies in meteorites The fifth chapter discusses isotopic variations in the Earth's mantle and the sixth chapter reviews the variations in the isotopic compositions of natural waters on our planet In Chapters 7 8 9 and 10 these isotopic constraints and concepts are applied to various facets of the origin and evolution of igneous rocks bringing in much material on radiogenic isotopes as well because these problems require a multi dimensional attack for their solution In Chapters 11 and 12 the problems of hydrothermal alteration by meteoric waters and ocean water are considered together with discussions of the physics and chemistry of hydrothermal systems and the ^{18}O ^{16}O history of ocean water Finally in Chapters 13 and 14 these concepts are applied to problems of metamorphic petrology and ore deposits particularly with respect to the origins of the fluids involved in those processes
