Fiber-reinforced Plastics Composites - Thermoplastic and Thermoset Resins

Aug 20

Fiber-reinforced plastics utilize two types of matrix materials: Thermoset and Thermoplastic. Though both matrices have been around since the dawn of the composites era, primary structural parts have been mainly manufactured using thermoset matrices due to their ease of processing.

However, since the emergence of thermoplastic additive manufacturing (commonly known as 3D printing) thermoplastic composites have created a new image of ease of processing and sustainability. There is now a growing trend toward the additive manufacturing of thermoplastic composites for primary structures.

The blog here focuses on introducing both types of matrices and their associated pros and cons for applications, ease of production, and sustainability. In this blog post, we are focusing on long-fiber composites only.

Thermoplastic Resin

Thermoplastics, like metals, soften and melt as more heat is applied, and re-hardening with cooling. This process of crossing the softening and/or melting threshold (T_g) can be repeated as often as desired without any appreciable effect on the material properties in either state. Typical thermoplastics used in structural composites parts include:

Acrylonitrile Butadiene Styrene (ABS)

Acrylonitrile Butadiene Styrene, often abbreviated as ABS, is an opaque engineering thermoplastic widely used in electronic housings, auto parts, consumer products, pipe fittings, Lego toys, and many more.
