

Appropriating Arguments: Academic Reading and Writing

John Corbett

Tertiary education courses, especially those in the arts and social sciences, generally require students to write compositions based on prescribed readings. Although students with poor skills in "appropriating" arguments contained in such readings are at a disadvantage, and may even be accused of plagiarism, this aspect of writing has been relatively neglected in published teaching materials for English for Academic Purposes. This article describes various techniques for promoting academic competence by helping students to summarize, synthesize and evaluate prescribed readings legitimately.

Despite the continuing growth in the number of coursebooks on English for Academic Purposes (EAP), it is often difficult for teachers to match published materials with the highly specific needs of their own students. One partial solution is a set of strategies and procedures which can be used with texts relevant to the students' own disciplines. This article suggests several strategies which I have found useful. These strategies were developed in an EAP reading and writing course that is part of a B.A. Program in English as a Foreign Language (EFL) for overseas undergraduate students at Stirling University. Since the EAP course should be seen particularly in the context of the first semester's overall structure, I shall sketch the other two components of the first semester program.

On entering the B.A. in EFL, the students, who come from a variety of backgrounds (Greek, Cypriot, French, Chinese, and Japanese), take three courses: one in General English, which aims to improve overall control of the language; one in Contextual Studies, which aims to provide some of the social, historical and cultural background necessary to understand the content of further university courses; and finally EAP. The first semester of the EAP course has concentrated on reading and particularly writing, because these are the skills most urgently required in the university system. Stirling University has quite rigorous continuous assessment plus examinations in most university departments, and by far the majority of the departments assesses written work only. The students therefore need to write efficiently and well, drawing on a range of prescribed texts, if they are to succeed.

readings of Benjamin Lee Whorf's principle of linguistic relativity focus almost exclusively on the controversial notion that language constrains or determines thought. Recent scholarship has only begun to assess the creative epistemological and pragmatic dimensions of Whorf's theory of language and their compatibility with the ideas of his contemporaries in rhetoric, philosophy, and psychology. This book provides a new reading of Whorf which situates his writings among those of Bakhtin, Vygotsky, and Wittgenstein. Exploring the ramifications of linguistic relativity for rhetorical theory, the philosophy of language, and interlingual discourse analysis, the author re-accentuates Whorf's belief in the need to overcome linguacentrism and ethnocentrism through an enlightened multilingual awareness.

The Oral-literate Connection Diane Dewhurst Belcher, Alan Hirvela, 2008. The Oral-Literate Connection: Perspectives on L2 Speaking, Writing, and Other Media Interactions presents the most current insights from research and theory on the numerous ways in which L2 speaking and writing support and enhance each other. Contributors to this collection not only report on recent research and theoretical developments but also on state-of-the-art pedagogical practices linking oral skills and literacy. Although research and theory are informed by practice throughout the text's four parts, the thematic organization proceeds from more theoretical and research-oriented issues to more classroom-based perspectives: Theory and research on the interaction between speaking and writing; How speaking scaffolds writing; How writing scaffolds speaking; How technology bridges speaking and writing. This volume offers readers both a compelling rationale for connecting speaking and writing in the L2 classroom and an informed means of making these connections. A wide array of theoretical and classroom-oriented topics is offered, ranging from sociocultural and second language acquisition theory to classroom concordancing and blogging. The book has a foreword by John M. Swales and an Afterword by Paul Kei Matsuda.
