COLLABORATIVE PRACTICE MATERIALS

(The following is intended only as a general overview of certain legal principals and procedures that apply in family law proceedings. It is not intended to constitute legal advice or a legal opinion. You should consult with an attorney to obtain information and advice specifically addressing your concerns and issues.)

1. How long will it take for my divorce to be completed?

A divorce is not a quick process. The earliest one can terminate marital status is six months and one day after service of a petition for dissolution of marriage on the other party (who is called the "respondent"). Other issues in the case can take a longer or shorter time to resolve. The timing of resolution may depend upon the amount of information to gather, the emotional state of the participants, and the complexity of the issues to resolve. The Collaborative Process moves at a pace mutually determined by the parties, and can result in an agreement in weeks or months. In contrast, litigated cases can take a number of months or even years to conclude.

2. Will I automatically be divorced in six months?

In California, you can obtain a dissolution of your marriage (formerly called a divorce) no earlier than six months and one day from the date the Petition is served on the Respondent. If the other issues of the divorce (i.e. property division, support and parenting issues) are not resolved within this six month time frame, you are entitled to request a "bifurcated judgment." This is a legal process by which your status as a married person is separated ("bifurcated") from the other issues in your case, and a judgment terminating your status as a married person is obtained. This does not happen automatically. If you want to terminate your marital status before the other issues of your case are resolved, you must affirmatively ask the court for relief. However, there are very important legal and financial consequences of a bifurcation that must be considered in deciding whether to obtain a bifurcated judgment.

3. What is the difference between a "legal separation" and a "divorce"?

The main difference between obtaining a legal separation and a marital dissolution ("divorce") is that marital status is not terminated in a legal separation proceeding. Occasionally parties choose to pursue a legal separation for personal reasons such as religious or ethical beliefs or health insurance concerns. They still, however, must address the same issues as parties undergoing a divorce (i.e. support, parenting, division of marital assets and debts). Also, in order to file for a divorce, you must reside in the
