

AC1.2 - The reasons why crimes go unreported.

There are two ways in which crimes are reported in the UK. Either by reporting them straight to the police or through the crime survey for England and Wales. However, crimes that go unreported are referred to as the "dark figure of crime". There are many reasons why crimes may go unreported.

Personal reasons:

One reason why someone may not report a crime would be due to fear of the possible consequences of reporting. It is common for victims who know the offender to fear reporting what has happened. This fear of reporting is often the case for those experiencing domestic abuse as they may worry about further crimes against them as punishment for reporting to police.

Another reason would be the victim being too ashamed to report. Victims of rape or child abuse may fall into this category as they may not want to completely admit what happened to them.

Crimes may also go unreported if those who have witnessed them are uninterested in going through the process. This may include those witnessing underage smoking, general drug use, disorderly conduct or vagrancy.

Through similar to an individual being disinterested, a crime may not be reported if the person witnessing it happen is not personally affected by the crime taking place. This would be the case for a witness to accidental property damage. A real-life example would be the informal holiday of Mischief Night when mostly teenagers and some children engage in vandalism the day before Halloween. Although this is against the law, it has become somewhat normalised, and many are uninterested in reporting the actions of these youths.

Social and Cultural Reasons:

A further reason why a crime may go unreported is because that crime may not be completely known as such therefore many may not go report such an action taking place. This lack of knowledge may also encompass the fact that someone may not necessarily know how to report that crime. For example, if someone is experiencing some form of cybercrime, they may not understand how to report such behaviour.

Many may not know if a crime has even been committed if it seems too complex or difficult to understand. This would be the case for certain white-collar crimes like fraud.

Many crimes that we are aware of are because of the media's coverage of it. The problem with this is that newspapers will focus on certain topics and completely ignore or leave out others. Overall, media and their "newsworthy" items will be biased. Therefore, if there is a lack of media interest on a certain type of crime, the public may not be aware such crime are even happening. It is common for the media to cover less somewhat boring crimes, for example white collar crime, but will instead focus on more high-profile cases like stabbings or murders.
