

AQA A-LEVEL PHILOSOPHY: MORALITY

TOPIC 3: VIRTUE ETHICS

Aristotelian Virtue Ethics

Aristotelian virtue ethics is a moral theory developed by Aristotle that focuses on the development of good character traits, or virtues, as the foundation for ethical behavior. Rather than judging actions solely by their outcomes (consequentialism) or by strict adherence to rules (deontology), Aristotle emphasizes the importance of becoming a virtuous person. For Aristotle, living ethically means living in accordance with virtue, which leads to flourishing and fulfilling one's potential as a human being.

The Good for Human Beings: Eudaimonia as the Final End

For Aristotle, the ultimate goal or "the good" for human beings is eudaimonia, which is often translated as "flourishing" or "happiness." Eudaimonia is not simply a fleeting emotional state but the final end or highest good that gives meaning to life.

- Eudaimonia as the Final End: According to Aristotle, every action we take aims at some good, but eudaimonia is the final end because it is the ultimate goal we pursue for its own sake, not as a means to something else. Eudaimonia is achieved through living a life of virtue in accordance with reason, which Aristotle sees as the defining function of humans.
 - Relationship between Eudaimonia and Pleasure: While eudaimonia is closely linked to a fulfilling life, Aristotle does not equate it with pleasure alone. Pleasure is an important part of eudaimonia, but it must be the right kind of pleasure—the pleasure that accompanies virtuous activity. Pleasures associated with base desires (e.g., indulgence in excess food or drink) are not conducive to eudaimonia. Instead, true happiness comes from acting virtuously and realizing one's full potential.
