Interlaboratory evaluation of test methods to determine TAPPI repeatability and reproducibility

1. Scope

1.1 This practice describes techniques for conducting intra-laboratory and interlaboratory studies, analyzing the results of intra-laboratory and interlaboratory studies and the formulation of appropriate precision statements for TAPPI test methods. The techniques recommended have the primary purpose of providing reliable information on the basis of which a broadly applicable precision statement can be made regarding the performance of a TAPPI test method.

1.2 To achieve the above objective satisfactorily, it is essential that a sound statistical design be employed in the planning of an interlaboratory study. Two situations are considered: (a) repeatability or comparison of test results within a laboratory (same material, operator, apparatus, environmental conditions, making tests in the shortest reasonable timeframes); and (b) reproducibility or comparison of test results among laboratories (same material, but different operator, apparatus and perhaps environmental conditions). There are a multitude of intermediate measures of precision, e.g. same laboratory and operator using different instruments or different laboratories using a shared calibration standard etc., which are not covered in this standard.

1.2.1 Other situations within a laboratory are not considered, e.g., data collected by all operators, or on all apparatus, or on different occasions when different environmental conditions might prevail. Because the agreement among the values obtained in these situations depends on the degree of supervision and control exercised in that laboratory, statements of precision about these situations are not appropriate in a test method for general use.

2. Summary of practice

2.1 Reliable data is gathered on which the precision statement is to be formed. The data may come from any of the following sources: critical data from a known source with sufficient supporting information, intralaboratory study, or interlaboratory study.

2.2 For the conduct of an interlaboratory study, randomized test specimens of each of several materials are distributed to the participating laboratories, along with appropriate instructions and data sheets. The data returned by the laboratories are analyzed one material at a time on assumption that the different materials will yield similar precision data if NOT made).

2.3 Tabular, statistical, and graphical diagnostic procedures are used to estimate the precision parameters of the method under question and to show unusual features of the data and patterns among materials which may affect the validity or form of the precision statement.

2.4 Finally, the information is appropriately summarized in a form from which the precision statement may be readily understood and applied by users of the test method.
