

Environmental Concerns

Buddhist Responses

As many religious people view it, Buddhist reality is profoundly ecological, and Buddhism itself is an ecological religion. It powerfully expresses human identification with nature. Buddhists believe that all things, including humans, exist by their interrelationship with all other parts of nature. To think of one's self as isolated from the rest of nature is to unrealist.

Joshi Kalapurna said:

"The Buddha taught that respect for life and the natural world is essential. By living simply one can be in harmony with other creatures and learn to appreciate the interconnectedness of all lives. The simplicity of life involves developing openness to our environment and relating to the world with awareness and responsive perception. It also enables us to enjoy without possessing, and mutually benefit each other without manipulation." :

Buddhist teachers and masters constantly remind us of the importance of living in tune with nature and respecting life.

Buddhist precepts direct the faithful to seek a right livelihood, an essential dimension of which is concern for the life of all creatures. (This puts emphasis on "ahimsa" (avoiding injury to any sentient creature) . This is the first of the five precepts of Buddhist life and a major principle of Jainism. In practice, Buddhists believe that it is the act of killing or hurting an animal which is harmful, but not the eating of meat that someone else has provided.

Note that the Buddhist king Ashoka the Great established hospitals for both human and animals. He insisted on kindness to animals, and forbade their killing even for food.

Buddhism teaches that if we wish to save the environment, we must first analyze our lives to determine how our self-delication is destroying the world by depleting, overpopulating, and polluting the environment.

The Buddhist approach to solving the global ecological crisis then includes :

1. Compassion is the basis for a balanced view of the whole world and of the environment.
2. The use of the "care not not care" approach means that nothing in nature is spoiled or wasted. Wasteful destruction upsets the vital balance of life.
3. Ecology is rebuilt through the philosophy of Sarvodaya (gift of all), which is based on loving kindness, compassionate action, and altruistic joy. :
