reaction of the receiving country An argument is made that although the United States and Mexico have different cultures and political systems their responses to the Central American outflow have been similar partly humanitarian partly restrictionist However the restrictionist views have been modified because of divisions within the public and private sectors A special section within the analysis of Central Americans in Mexico treats the problem of the recognition of Guatemalans as refugees and other Central Americans not recognized as refugees Coping with first asylum entries is briefly treated in the analysis of Central Americans in the United States as well as certain tensions between the UNHCR and the United States over jurisdiction and policies In the conclusions the authors compare the US and Mexican responses maintaining that neither government has addressed the question of its absorptive capacity seriously and make several recommendations for improving the situation
