Disposal Options For Ships:

Disposal Options for Ships Ronald Wayne Hess, Denis Rushworth, Michael V. Hynes, John E. Peters, 2001 This book identifies and evaluates options for the disposal of U S Navy and U S Maritime Administration MARAD ships Four options are considered long term storage domestic recycling overseas recycling and reefing i e the sinking of ships to build artificial reefs The author examined the use of private and public U S shipyards international organizations and partnerships between U S and foreign companies The study took applicable environmental and worker health and safety regulations into account to arrive at estimates of the costs benefits capacities capabilities feasibility and risks associated with each option It found that the Navy and MARAD should exploit the experience gained in the Navy's ongoing Ship Disposal Program and the recently initiated MARAD program to dispose of poor condition ships in the inventory Such a strategy would reduce the current risk of ship sinking or other notable environmental damage At the same time this study also found that both agencies should initiate coordinated discussions with the Environmental Protection Agency EPA and other coastal regulatory authorities to develop standards for reefing that will make it a viable long term option for disposing of as many of the 358 ships in the current inactive fleet as possible The Navy and MARAD should not opt for overseas recycling such a program would involve many impediments and difficulties Neither should they opt for long term storage which entails high and uncertain costs and only defers rather than solves the problem of disposing of the ships

Disposal Options for Ships, 2001 The U S Navy and the U S Maritime Administration MARAD together preside over a fleet of some 450 retired naval vessels and merchant ships that grows each month as ship retirements continue Some of these ships will find their way into the navies of U S allies and friendly nations others will be sold or donated to interested parties and some will be consumed in live fire military exercises known as sinking exercises or SINKEX Those that remain about 358 ships will require some other form of disposal over the next 20 years Those 358 ships were the focus of our study We evaluated four options for how the Navy and MARAD might proceed long term storage domestic recycling ship dismantlement in U S naval or commercial shipyards overseas recycling and reefing i e the sinking of a ship s to create an artificial reef for a marine habitat or as a site for recreational divers Of these four only the last three are truly ship disposal options Long term storage which defers the decision of how to dispose of the ships until some later date was included to show the consequences of taking no action

Artificial Reefs: A Disposal Option for Navy and MARAD Ships, 2004 Over the next 20 years after accounting for unfunded forms of ship disposal such as donations sales or transfers to foreign governments and private interests more than 350 Navy and Maritime Administration MARAD vessels will require some form of government funded disposal A previous RAND Corporation study Hess et al Disposal Options for Ships MR 1377 NAVY 2001 reviewed such disposal options including recycling either domestically or overseas and long term storage Preparation and use of ships for construction of artificial reefs was identified as the lowest cost domestic option for ship disposal In the research reported here we examine the demand for ships as reefs and the impediments to such use We suggest program goals and review possible business models for their potential to minimize risks and costs to the Navy While it had been our intention to conduct a more thorough analysis the U S Navy for which this research was conducted found our preliminary results satisfactory for its purposes and asked that we not proceed further Our reefing analysis is thus suggestive rather than definitive For the reader s convenience a synopsis of the earlier study is included in this briefing Some of the findings have been updated to reflect information coming to our attention since that report was published Artificial Reefs Michael Hynes,John E. Peters,Denis Rushworth,2004 By 2005 the U S Navy and the Maritime Administration will have accumulated some 360 retired ships in need of disposal A previous RAND study reviewed disposal options such as recycling either domestically or overseas and long term storage However preparation and use of the ships for construction of artificial reefs was identified as the lowest cost option With the demonstrated potential attractiveness of reefing as a disposal option in this study the authors examine the economic legal environmental and programmatic issues that might bear on the Navy s decision to pursue the reefing option more seriously They examine the demand for ships to be used as reefs and the impediments to such use suggest program goals and review possible business models for their potential to minimize risks and costs to the Navy
