

Surviving Distance Learning as an Adult Learner in Higher Education

Mfon Nwabuoku, BSc, MEd¹

Keywords: adult learner, higher education, distance education, distance learning, adult learning

In the wake of rising uncertainty, anxiety, and safety concerns related to COVID-19, many higher education institutions (mine included) adopted distance education as the sole mode of instruction. Also referred to as distance learning, this mode includes the domain of teacher–learner relationships that exists when both parties—teacher and learner—are separated by space and/or time (Moore, 1997). Simply put, distance learning includes any formal teaching/learning experience outside of the traditional face-to-face classroom. For me, distance learning in an academic setting presented a new experience. I was glad to safely continue my studies and not overly concerned by the new delivery mode. But that soon changed, as I quickly realized distance learning poses unique challenges. In this reflection, I will share my experience overcoming distance learning challenges. Through this window into my experience, I will provide helpful information to adult learners for survival and insights to adult educators for effective design of distance learning modules and programs. Here is my story . . .

As a result of the pandemic and resulting school directives, my instructors informed students how they intended to get us through the rest of the semester. One instructor scheduled Zoom meetings as class sessions. Although apart, I almost felt like I was in a physical classroom, for I could see and hear my instructor and classmates. At the start of my next course, however, things changed. This new instructor sent out an email with this excerpt: “There will be NO face-to-face class meetings. Everything will be online, self-paced.” Not having a face-to-face class did not bother me at first, and I was initially ecstatic about fully online and self-paced lessons. I felt like I had been given a little (and welcome) break from classes, especially because my instructor gave us a long time to complete the course. I could choose when to work, and I had a lot of time to finish the work. I even had fun, until beginning the course with loads of text to read and a
