

DAVID ENGLISH is Associate Editor of the Daily Express and a television commentator on current affairs. He was correspondent in the United States for six years, two of which he spent as a White House reporter. He covered the 1960 and 1964 Presidential campaigns. In his last two years in the United States he was chief of the Express's seven-man New York Bureau, and during that time visited all fifty states in the Union. In 1967 he returned to London as Foreign Editor and was promoted to Associate Editor in 1968. During the campaign he was in charge of a team of twelve Express writers who were assigned to the election. The team was composed of experts on American affairs, and included reporters who had first covered American politics in President Roosevelt's time, as well as younger writers who had never visited the United States before. Mr English commented across the Atlantic to direct the team, but as the campaign developed he moved his wife and three children to New York, 'so that I could see them for the odd weekend without having to fly six thousand miles every time.' Aged 37, he lives (in non-election years) in London, and describes himself as a 'totally committed Americanophile'.
