

GRILLED CACTUS PADDLES

Cactus paddles have always been considered a delicacy in Western American cuisine, particularly in the Sonora of what's now southern Arizona. All kinds are edible, but cactus are eaten in the West—especially today around San Diego and the Gulf, at a rate that encompasses a wide variety of cacti and the pulled-cactus, fresh, and sugared. Don't take it too far: many of the most common cacti have been used to say that to really understand their form, but if you are looking for a vegetable substitute in a recipe, a green cholla, ball cactus, and cholla—each a kind of cholla, slightly larger than the other—will get the idea. Most western recipes will instruct you to salt, drain, steam, and cook the cactus paddles to remove the bitter that's part of their essence—but Western American recipes continue and incorporate the natural lipids. If you'd prefer to

Recipe 4 to 4

- 2 cactus paddles, cleaned (see page 44)
- 1 teaspoon salt
- 1 teaspoon freshly cracked black pepper

avoid it, remove the spines from the best when they're still a bit firm, scrubbing intensely with a brush. When you're choosing cactus paddles, look for tenderness and a slight give—the water you pour should be smooth. Look for paddles with a slight ridge that runs down. And I can't stress this enough: be careful when choosing the spines. I speak from experience. When I was around age thirteen, I got stuck paddles with my hands, my brother thought it would be funny to pull "bushy" cactus and was, indeed, and fell right into a cactus. Despite the odd, thick memory of the sting of those spines in my hands and arms, I still love cactus. But as a food, not a punishment. In the Sonora, cactus is served and shared freely to the west.

In a large bowl or sauté pan, add the cactus paddles and salt and pepper. Turn and mix when the paddles are beginning to soften and to light brown. When the grill marks are visible, remove the cactus paddles to the grill and grill each side for about 4 minutes. Remove from the heat and enjoy them. Adapt the amount of seasoning and serve accordingly.
