The Nonverbal Advantage Carol Kinsey Goman, 2009-03-12 The most important thing in communication is hearing what isn't said Peter F Drucker HAVE YOU EVER WONDERED What kind of impression am I making Should I believe what my boss told me Am I dealing with a potential buyer or am I just wasting my time Did my whole team understand what I said What did the customer mean by that How do I know if he really supports my idea Is the audience angry frustrated interested or bored The answers to such questions are right before your eyes That's because people in professional settings are constantly telling each other exactly what they think and feel and it often has nothing to do with the words they speak Your boss may say that you'll be considered for a promotion but if she's leaning back with crossed arms and a forced smile she's sending the opposite message The customer may say he's not interested in buying that new car but if he keeps glancing at the contract on the table he's telling you that he is interested The silent signals of nonverbal communication tend to reveal underlying motives and emotions fear honesty joy indecision frustration and much more The tiniest gestures like the way your co workers stand or enter a room often speak volumes about their confidence self worth and credibility And the way you sit stand or look at others reveals more about your true intent than you may realize
