Abstract: Individuals living in rural areas often face challenges in accessing healthcare, increasing their risk of poor health outcomes. Farmers, a sub-population in rural areas, are particularly vulnerable to mental health issues and suicide, yet they exhibit low rates of help-seeking behavior. The aim of our study was to develop an in-depth understanding of the issues influencing mental help-seeking among farmers living in rural areas from the perspectives of healthcare providers, as well as to explore the strategies providers use to navigate through these issues to effectively engage with this vulnerable population. Methods: We used a descriptive phenomenological approach to understand healthcare providers' perspectives, experiences, and approaches to providing mental healthcare to farmer clients in rural areas. Semi-structured interviews were conducted with 21 participants practicing in Canada between March and May 2023. Results: Our analysis yielded five thematic areas: (1) ensuring accessibility, (2) establishing reliability, (3) addressing stoicism and stigma, (4) navigating dual roles, and (5) understanding community trauma. Conclusions: Healthcare service delivery for farmers is multifaceted. This study fills a gap in knowledge by translating these data to inform an evidence-based model and a list of recommendations for implementing agriculturally informed practices in rural areas.

1. Introduction

Compared to urban populations, consistent evidence shows a health disadvantage associated with living in rural areas, a trend observed across developed countries [1,2]. In Canada, research consistently reports higher mortality rates, decreased life expectancy, greater incidence and prevalence of morbidity, and poorer self-reported health status in rural populations compared to their urban counterparts [3–7]. Several explanations for this difference have been proposed, including a higher likelihood of smoking, alcohol use, and obesity [4,8], patterns of health service use [9,10], and socioeconomic factors such as lower levels of education, income instability, and exposure to hazardous environmental and occupational conditions [11,12]. Within rural areas exists one sub-population, farmers, who report concerning levels of poor physical and mental health. Given the difficulty of engaging with farmers on mental health issues [13], we aimed to explore the issues influencing mental help-seeking among farmers from the perspectives of mental healthcare providers. We were also interested in understanding the strategies these providers used to navigate these issues to effectively engage with this vulnerable population.

In 2021, nearly one-fifth of Canadians (18%) lived in a rural area [14]. The term “rural” is complex and socially constructed, with no universal definition [15]. For our study, we applied a broad definition that considers rural areas as all territories beyond urban areas [16]. Thus, rural areas can include towns, villages, agricultural spaces, as well as
