

Deliberative democracy

In deliberative democracy, citizens—in addition to electing representatives—participate in public reasoning and decision-making. This model aims for discourse rooted in rationality and impartiality, often assuming that the public can arrive at a broad consensus on the common good or the interests of citizens. However, deliberative democracy leaves out institutions for regulation and enforcement of this consensus, and downplays the role of power and conflict in politics.

See: John Rawls, Jürgen Habermas, G.A. Cohen, Seyla Benhabib, Amy Gutmann and Dennis Thompson

Deliberative democracy brings citizens together for rational discussion.
