A demographic perspective on gender inequality

Christelle Hamel, Wilfried Rault (coord.) and INED's Demography, Gender and Societies* research unit

Recent decades have seen major advances in gender equality. Are men and women now truly equal? The research conducted by INED's Demography, Gender and Societies research unit confirms that much has been accomplished, but that the road ahead remains long.

Reasons for discrimination: HIV status, skin colour and sexual orientation

In education, remarkable progress in gender equality has been achieved since the 1970s in France. Among the younger generations, women are now more highly qualified than men. In 2009-2011, 31% of women left the educational system with a qualification equivalent to three or more years in higher education, versus 24% of men. [1] Yet, like other contexts of child socialization, schools still generate gender inequality. Boys still form a large majority in the most prestigious academic courses that offer better future career prospects, even though they perform less well at school than girls. This paradoxical situation is explained by the gender stereotypes encountered throughout the educational trajectory: parents' and teachers' expectations, student-teacher interactions and peer relationships are all still coloured by gender representations that lead to different academic pathways for boys and girls and which narrow the range of opportunity, for girls especially. [2] Likewise, the representations in school textbooks perpetuate and lend continued legitimacy to an inequalitarian gender order. They reflect neither the reality nor the ideal of parity and equality (Box 1).

At work and in the family: persistent inequality

Thanks to their academic success at all levels of education, and their higher levels of qualification, women are now massively present on the labour market, and the labour force participation rate is practically equivalent for both sexes: according to

Box 1. Gender stereotypes in school textbooks

School textbooks are full of gender stereotypes and contribute to the reproduction. An exhaustif census of characters illustrating 20 maths-metrics textbooks used in 2008 in French primary schools reveals the vitality of inequalitarian gender norms. [1] On average, the represented characters include more boys than girls and, among adults, more men than women. In some books, up to two-thirds of the characters are boys. Girls outnumber boys in just one book (33%), but in all others they are a minority. Adult women, sometimes totally absent, represent 18% of the characters at most, while adult men account for up to 35% of the total. Children of both sexes are portrayed in similar ways, but with few distinguishing details: boys, more often seen with pencil in hand, are shown in more active poses (doing an exercise or motions, for example when controlling a difficult exercise, while this is never the case for boys). The differences are especially visible in the portrayal of adults. Women are mainly associated with domestic tasks or jobs – such as teachers or shop assistants – which correspond to their traditional nurturing role. The recent diversification of women's occupational trajectories is not represented. Conversely, men are portrayed mainly in a work environment and are shown in a wide range of occupations.
