Abstract

Skinner proclaimed Behaviorism as the fundamental learning theory of human and animal behavior based on discriminative stimuli and later introduced Radical Behaviorism which recognized private events as relevant behavioral antecedents. Skinner sets all human behavior within a cycle of stimulus response where any action can serve as either a response to or a stimulus for another behavior. Much research has examined aspects of adolescent development and found definite connections to behavior theory. But some that slightly breach the behavior theory barrier and still others that completely diverge from its reinforcing consequential confines. Parents can employ positive and negative reinforcement for mechanical functioning such as chores and curfews but there are biological and neurological processes occurring during adolescent development that reinforcement cannot address.

In the model proposed here reinforcement is central to adolescent development but an in-depth analysis reveals many associated constructs and phenomena that lie beyond Skinner's behavioral theoretical boundaries.

Keywords: Adolescent; Behaviorism; Dysfunction; Hyper-Accessibility; Questionnaires

Burrhus Frederic Skinner has presented a theory of behavior modification (behaviorism – behavior theory) that is basically functional [1]. The theory shows us how to change behavior without the regard for internal feelings and thoughts. Skinner denounces "mentalisms" such as self-development, self-concept, and self-esteem as factors in behavior analysis. Skinner's behavior theory is comparable to learning to cook without knowing anything about agriculture. Or becoming a clothing designer without learning how fabric is created. His theory is entirely useful for the momentary manipulation of acute situational dysfunction and applicable to educational and psychotherapeutic interventions [2]. However, we cannot discuss adolescent development without the topics of emotions and physiology. This is the period of human development where young people are immersed in a sea of hormones, neurological novelty and new plateaus that they must learn to navigate, adapt, and master [3].

In this paper I will present research that explored these novelties and plateaus and fit Skinner's concepts of reinforcement (positive and negative), punishment and extinction into the implications of the presented articles. I am compelled to integrate behavior theory into adolescent adjustment theory in an effort to design interventions that assist young people in their transition into emerging adulthood. The current social issues that young people face are daunting and research shows a need to address high suicide rates among this specific population. Via school or social settings adolescents can engage with supportive interactive media that encourages introspection and guidance toward autonomy and connectedness, self-worth and responsibility.

Adolescence is a period where parents can experience an abrupt disconnect from their children as physiological and psychological changes render them unrecognizable.
