

Adoption of Bioengineered Crops

Jorge Fernandez-Cornejo and William D. McBride

Introduction

Technological change has been acknowledged as a critical component of productivity and economic growth (Solow, 1994; Griliches, 1995). The rapid adoption and diffusion of new technologies within the U.S. agricultural sector has resulted in sustained agricultural productivity growth and ensured an abundance of food (Huffman and Evenson, 1993; Alston and Pardey, 1996; Ball et al., 1997). However, since technological change can affect employment, trade, real wages, and profits, the adoption of new technologies may trigger asymmetric effects on different sectors of the economy.

International competitiveness and environmental issues have also been linked to technological innovation and adoption (Stoneman, 1995). Furthermore, technology policy issues have surfaced during discussions about the appropriate role of the public sector (e.g., level of public research and development funding) in fostering new innovations and promoting their adoption (Feder and Umali, 1993). Because of the economic opportunities and challenges that new technologies offer, the technology innovation and adoption process continues to interest economists, sociologists, and policymakers.

Economists and sociologists want to understand what causes adoption rates to differ and what constrains the rapid adoption of innovations. Several researchers have examined the influence of farmers' attributes on the adoption of agricultural innovations (Rahn and Huffman, 1984; Caswell and Zilberman, 1985). In the past, most adoption studies focused on technological innovations that increase productivity. Studies have since shifted their focus toward adoption of agricultural technologies that affect environmental quality and conserve scarce natural resources. Thus, during the 1970s and 1980s, studies proliferated on the adoption of environmentally preferable technologies such as IPM (Fernandez-Cornejo, Jans, and Smith, 1998).

More recently, U.S. farmers are adopting biotechnology innovations that, beyond their impact on productivity, have also caused environmental and consumer concerns, particularly in Europe. These innovations (bioengineered crops) are embedded in the seeds and derive from the use of genetic engineering (GE) techniques.

Genetic engineering modifies organisms by recombinant DNA techniques. These techniques allow a more precise and time-saving alteration of a plant's traits, facilitating the development of characteristics that are not feasible through traditional plant breeding. Genetic engineering also allows scientists to target a single plant trait, thus decreasing the number of unintended characteristics that often accompany traditional breeding techniques, and increasing the speed at which breeders can develop new varieties. The first generation of bioengineered crops includes crops with pest management traits, including crops carrying genes (such as the gene from the soil bacterium Bt, Bacillus thuringiensis) selected for resistance to certain insects and/or tolerance to specific herbicides.

This report discusses the adoption of GE crops with pest management traits, which has risen dramatically since commercial introduction in the mid-1990s. Issues related to the adoption of these bioengineered crops—including farm impacts, consumer acceptance, environmental safety, and others—are among the leading concerns affecting U.S. agriculture. Because of the controversy surrounding these issues and the continual introduction of new technologies, there is great need for objective measurement and analysis of all components of overall social welfare implications of GE crops—including the farm-level impacts.

Factors Shaping Adoption of Bioengineered Crops

An innovation's profitability, compared with traditional alternatives, has been regarded as the primary motivation behind adoption. This would suggest that the widespread adoption of genetically engineered crops follows from their perceived profitability over traditional methods. However, other factors like
