Summary of the essay that declared the discovery of similia similibus

Essay on a new principle for ascertaining the curative powers of drugs With a few glances at those hitherto employed-

Published in Hufeland's Journal der praktischen Arzneykunde. Vol. ii. Part iii. 1796, collected and translated to English by R.E. Dudgeon*

Begins the Essay by citing French Academy of Sciences (started in AD 1666 <https://www.academie-sciences.fr/en/>) – study on chemistry for identifying curative properties – turned negative and denied chemistry's role in medicine –

Hahnemann is not of this opinion – appreciating the role of chemistry in medicine.

Citing many examples to show that chemistry cannot be excluded from a share in the discovery of the medicinal powers of drugs.

that chemistry should not be consulted with respect to those medicinal powers which relate, not to hurtful substances to be acted on immediately in the human body, but to changes wherein the functions of the animal organism are first concerned.

explains the limitations of experimentation on animals when above mentioned methods exhausted to give data, the systematizer looks for external signs of plants to make a relationship with the disease (they are very deceptive) gives examples.

Nothing remains for us but experiment on the human body. But what kind of experiment? Accidental or methodical?
