Date 1953–1963

In July 1954 the US housing finance expert Charles Abrams landed in Turkey on yet another consulting job for the United Nations.¹ His mandate was complicated; he had to write a report on the prevailing land use and zoning as well as propose planning legislation and housing finance structures for the future. A seasoned observer of bureaucracies, Abrams quickly realized that his contribution would simply be submerged in the pile of reports that bore witness to the Turkish Ministry of Public Works' long dealings with international institutions. Unable to cut through the red tape of mid-level officials, he decided to take matters into his own hands. Enlisting a translator to join him, Abrams acquired a jeep and a driver to take a "four thousand-mile" whirlwind tour around the country.

The trip was hasty, zooming through villages and towns, conducting ad-hoc interviews with unsuspecting officials, from provincial governors and mayors to "private architects, businessmen, directors of factories, village officials, and villagers," with most destinations not even meriting an overnight stay.² Still Abrams was satisfied with his findings, concluding that the trip gave him "a fairly comprehensive idea of the country and its conditions."³ He was not the first expert to have taken such a trip and come to such a definitive conclusion. But, as Burak Erdim has outlined in detail, he was the first to propose a university of engineering and planning—one that would later be named Middle East Technical University (METU) and go on to become one of Turkey's premier higher education institutions—as a solution to Turkey's planning woes.

But what did Abrams find during his expedition in Turkey? How were random samples able to "elicit the nature of the principal problems" facing
