Chapter 0: Key skills in Environmental Management

Exercise KS.1 Aims and hypotheses testing, experimental design

- 1
- a Soil pH will not affect the growth of plants as measured by their height.
 - b The best way to do this would be to set up a controlled experiment. In this example, the independent variable would be the soil pH and the dependent variable would be the height of the plants. Different dependent variables could be used, such as dry mass of plants or number of leaves.

The design should involve pots of soil in which the soil is identical in every way except for its pH. The pH could be adjusted by the addition of weak solutions of acid or alkaline. The pH achieved should be checked with some kind of pH meter or pH paper. Plants of as near as possible exactly the same age and size should then be planted in pots. These pots should then be kept in identical environments where factors such as light intensity, temperature and relative humidity either do not vary over time or vary in the same way for all pots. The height of the plants (or mass or leaf number) should be measured over time. The results can be recorded and analysed in a number of ways. One possibility for recording is to plot the height against time for each pH. A possibly more meaningful way of recording results in relation to the hypothesis is to plot the final height against pH. It would then be necessary to look at the graph to see if there was the relationship which will allow the null hypothesis to be rejected.

- c As pH increases, the trend is the plant height also increases. The plant is 13 cm taller at a pH of 7 than it is at a pH of 2. Acid pHs seem to depress plant growth. The relationship is not a straight line and raising the pH from 4 to 5 has a much bigger effect on plant height than any other single pH unit change. The results strongly suggest that the null hypothesis should be rejected and that we can say that pH does have an effect on the height of this plant.
- 2
- a The presence of heavy-metal ions in irrigation water will cause a reduction in the yield of maize cobs as measured by mass harvested.
 - b independent variable: concentration of heavy metal in irrigation water dependent variable: mass of maize cobs harvested

- c the density of maize plants in each of the four plots (that is the number of plants being grown assuming the four plots are the same area)
the age of the maize plants planted in all the plots, which should be the same
- d the nutrient status of the soil
the drainage of the soil
- e The maize is grown in the same field which is divided into four plots. This should ensure that the soil is the same in all four plots in respect of its nutrient status and drainage.

Exercise KS.2 Collecting data

- 1
- a Since the hypothesis mentions the predicted effect of heavy metal on growth rate, the mass of the fish would need to be determined over a period of time. Mass will be determined by weighing the fish on a suitably accurate balance. The choice of balance would be determined by the size of the fish, but since they are likely to be very small at the start of the experiment, a balance that can weigh to at least one place of decimals will probably be needed. The fish would be weighed on a regular basis over time. The regularity of weighing would be determined by the rate at which the fish are growing. In a fast-growing species, measurements may need to be taken once every few days, whereas in a slower growing species, weekly or even monthly measurements may be adequate.
 - b When it is not possible to count all of the individual items for which a result is needed, sampling has to be used. In this case a grid could be used. This could be constructed by ruling horizontal and vertical lines onto a large sheet of paper, which could then be laminated and placed in the bottom of a tray. All the eggs laid by the female could then be poured into the tray and the number of eggs in a random sample of the squares on the grid can be counted. The total is then found and divided by the number of squares sampled. This gives the average number of eggs per square and the total number of eggs can then be found by multiplying this average by the total number of squares. For example, if a 10×10 grid were constructed, this would give 100 squares in total. The eggs in 10 of these could be counted, the average number of eggs found, and this average then multiplied by 100. Such a procedure reduces the counting to be done tenfold.
