Counterattack on the Naktong, 1950 William Glenn Robertson, 1985 This Leavenworth Paper examines both the theory and practice of U S Army counterattack doctrine at the outbreak of the Korean War Through an analysis of the Army s manuals in effect in 1950 it establishes the importance of counterattack in defensive operations and identifies the general principles to be observed in mounting successful counterattacks The paper then employs a case study to determine the application of counterattack doctrine in the field and to test the validity of that doctrine The case study chosen for examination is the First Battle of the Naktong Bulge 6 19 August 1950 a part of the defense of the Pusan Perimeter In this battle the North Korean 4th Infantry Division crossed the Naktong River and penetrated deeply into the sector held by the U S 24th Infantry Division Depleted by peacetime budget cuts and recent heavy combat the 24th Infantry Division counterattacked to regain its original defensive positions along the river When the division proved incapable of restoring its front alone elements of two additional Army divisions and the 1st Provisional Marine Brigade joined the counterattack force Thus augmented the 24th Infantry Division ultimately repulsed the North Koreans and reestablished its original front During the two week period covered by this study the 24th Infantry Division and its attached units attempted at least sixty one counterattacks of company size or larger Analysis of these operations shows that the U S Army s counterattack doctrine was generally sound but that significant elements of that doctrine were not followed by the 24th Infantry Division during the battle This failure to implement valid doctrinal concepts appears both to have delayed the ultimate victory and increased its cost Although the study is rich in other lessons as well its findings regarding counterattack doctrine remain its central theme
