

The Case of H.M. - Cognitive Psychology

Aim

To understand how the removal of parts of the brain affects memory, especially the role of the hippocampus in forming new memories.

Procedure

H.M. had suffered from severe epilepsy since a childhood accident. In 1953, doctors performed surgery to reduce his seizures by removing parts of his medial temporal lobe, including the hippocampus.

After H.M.'s surgery, psychologist Brenda Milner and later Suzanne Corkin studied him for over 50 years using method triangulation — combining different types of tests and observations to understand his memory.

- Interviews & Observations: They spoke with H.M. regularly to assess his recall of personal events, everyday activities, and awareness of time passing.
- Memory Span Tests: He was asked to remember lists of numbers, words, or simple drawings immediately after hearing or seeing them, to test short-term memory.
- Learning Tasks: Researchers used mirror-drawing and other motor-skill tasks. Even though H.M. had no memory of ever practicing them, his performance improved over time, showing his procedural memory was intact.
- Recall & Recognition Tests: They tested his ability to remember new facts or recognize words and objects after minutes, hours, or days — he consistently failed to store new declarative memories.
- Longitudinal Study: They tracked his abilities and health over decades, comparing changes over time to see if his memory abilities improved or declined.

By combining experiments, interviews, and observations over many years, researchers built a fuller picture of how H.M.'s brain injury affected different memory systems.

Results

- Short-Term Memory: On digit span tests, H.M. could remember about 7 numbers for up to 30 seconds if he was not distracted — showing his short-term memory store was intact.
- Anterograde Amnesia: He could not form new long-term declarative memories. In recall and recognition tests, he consistently failed to remember new words, stories, or events after delays of more than 30 seconds.
- Procedural Memory: On motor-learning tasks like mirror-drawing, his performance improved with practice across days, even though he had no conscious memory of ever doing the task before — strong evidence that procedural memory relies on brain systems outside the hippocampus.
- Retrograde Amnesia: His memory for events from before the surgery was mostly intact for childhood and early life, but he had patchy memory loss for the years immediately before surgery.
- Stable Over Time: Across decades of testing, his memory profile remained consistent — no recovery of lost abilities, but also no major decline in his preserved skills, suggesting the damage was specific rather than progressive.

Conclusion

The hippocampus plays a crucial role in encoding short-term memories into long-term memories.
