

ERLE STANLEY GARDNER

The case of Erle Stanley Gardner, a jovial, sandy-haired California wit who turned speculator, is probably the most amusing phenomenon in all publishing history. He is the merry herald of the law, the first full-fledged prose industrialist, the most productive, highest-paid, most widely read writer of all time.

"With the energy of a bursting dam, the former small-town lawyer has flooded, baffled and confounded his competitors—the leisurely Emersons, Christies and Spellers—and left them reeling under a flood of statistics.

"I just try and write what people want. Damned if I know what the appeal is! I just keep turning them out, and people seem to like them. I try to keep my books in the realm of the believable."

"Gardner, who has now been riding the best-seller lists for 24 years, pondered, 'Why, I'm not even a writer, just a plot builder. A man who never moves out of place till he runs out of ideas, and then he's not interested in life any more and might as well give up. I use my legal experience and I get a kick out of writing or I wouldn't be doing it.' The day I stop getting a kick out of it I'll turn on something else."

"Gardner, meanwhile, keeps Perry Mason, his secondary best-seller, and his other projects moving with the relentless efficiency of a Detroit assembly line.

"In cases of piracy, he darts between his four California homes, goes at regularity at 6,000, often averages 10,000 words before bedtime.

"He never touches a typewriter, talks out his stories direct into a recording machine, employs seven full-time stenographers, frequently works on four books at a time."
