Petrocelli,2024 Examines Dakar s transformation from a small colonial capital to a dynamic city highlighting how its resourceful residents challenged French control by forging adaptive economic relationships During a transformative era in the first half of the twentieth century Dakar former capital of French West Africa and present day capital of Senegal evolved from a small colonial capital meant to serve the French administration to a dynamic city shaped not solely by colonial planners but also by its resourceful inhabitants In this important book historian Rachel Petrocelli introduces the concept of transactional culture a set of norms and practices forged by Dakar s residents to navigate life under colonial rule A central element of that culture was transience a defining feature permeating various facets of life in Dakar from commerce and employment to housing and interactions with the state The book uncovers a central dynamic economic relationships in Dakar were continually molded by the ebb and flow of diverse individuals each pursuing their own objectives despite the relentless efforts of the French state to exert control Both Europeans and Africans embraced adaptability in Dakar over fixed residence while immigrant communities implanted themselves and became integral to the city s transactional culture In this examination based on court records and other sources Petrocelli shows that as the French colonial state sought to shape and control Dakar it enacted policies to intentionally limit city dwellers resources Strategies like pawning possessions and taking out credit creatively devising housing and mobilizing identities and affiliations emerged as a result integrating Dakarois of every background These practices persisted long after French rule ended underscoring the enduring impact of Dakar s colonial history
