Students' Knowledge, Attitudes, and Behaviors

Students typically view their enrollment in college as an opportunity to acquire the knowledge and skills that are necessary to succeed in the workplace and to advance their general knowledge and life skills (Carter, Bishop & Kravits, 2006). The rate of entry into college provides “an indication of the degree to which a country’s population is acquiring higher-level skills and knowledge” (Wirt et al., 2004, p. 62). However, in 2004, one in four college freshmen at 4-year universities did not return for their sophomore year and nearly half of students in community colleges did not return to complete their degree (Netscape News with CNN, 2004). Empirical research over the last several decades corroborates these findings (Astin, 1975; Tinto, 1993). Tinto described this as a tremendous loss of resources (i.e., talent and revenue) and a principal concern for students, parents, and administrators. As a result, many universities and colleges have implemented some form of intervention, formal or informal, to increase academic achievement and positive social adjustment. These efforts are focused on increasing retention and graduation rates.
