

DIVERSITY AND CULTURAL COMPETENCY CASE STUDIES

Cultural Beliefs in a Scientific Presentation

A Hispanic female medical student is doing a case representation of a Hispanic female patient to a white male attending physician. The presentation includes a sympathetic recounting of the patient's beliefs, including naive ideas about illness, ideas of spirit possession and exorcism, and comfort from religious faith. The attending finds the presentation "excessively informal and unscientific," and suggests that the student includes this material because, "You're from her race, and are sympathetic to her." He scolds her that they are working at a prestigious medical center and suggests she make more conventional presentations.

Possible Questions for Discussion:

Why would the attending physician be so unsympathetic to this style of presentation and these aspects of a patient's life? Is his behavior appropriate?

The attending physician is unsympathetic to the style of presentation of the female Hispanic medical student and to the different aspects of the patient's life because the physician is not of the same race with the medical student. The physician is ethno-centric meaning he doesn't view/ value other culture aside from his own culture. He has different perspectives about the aspects of patient's life that is rooted on his own culture that is contrary/ not in line with the perspective of the medical student. Thus, leading him to have prejudices and not culturally competent in his profession.

Lastly, the behavior of the attending physician is inappropriate because he doesn't act professionally.

*if you were the student how would you feel?
How would you react?*

if I were the student, I will initially feel shame because I was scolded, and discouragement to continue because my superior (physician) thinks that my presentation is absurd/ inaccurate. But, despite of this, I will still be optimistic- look at it in the positive side that it is just a challenge for me that need to be surpassed. I will feel great that I am not like the physician who is an ethno-centric but rather I'm a culturally sensitive health care provider because I know how to respect and understand one's culture.

I would react to it positively by telling to the physician politely that what I included in the presentation is relevant because it is part of our culture; and treating patient should not only be limited to physical aspects but we have to treat them holistically- we should also consider the other aspects/ dimensions of man's life such as psychosocial where culture is incorporated, spiritual, psychological, and the like.

How can medical school faculty become better informed about the relevance of racial and cultural issues in patient care?

Medical school faculty become well informed about the relevance of racial and cultural issues in patient care by talking to medical school faculty and informing them directly about racial and cultural issues. Voicing out concerns regarding racial and cultural issues will make medical school faculty aware about the problem thus, alarming them to make a move to prevent such occurrences for the benefit of patients as well as their institution.
