Australian Film Tales Robert Cettl, 2014-09-29 The Australian Film Industry has been in constant operation in the century since the silent era and is replete with offbeat unusual and informative tales Australian Film Tales is a journey through this insightful and informative history for the Aussie film buff Indeed once during the silent era Australian film was the equal of the incipient American film industry then concentrating on Hollywood The first feature length films were Australian not American and Australian authorities were looking to use film to showcase both the nation and the talent of the Aussies within it There was always debate in Australian film circles however over which images were acceptable for export to present the country to the world over whether local or imported actors should be used in Australian films over how to censor those films which pushed the envelope and over how to make truly Australian films to be shown in Australia for Australians With such attention to both entertainment and national pride Australian films present quite the perplexing enigma both to the Australian movie goer and the general film buff From the much vaunted period in the 1970s known as the Australian New Wave Australian films have sought a quality which the pressures of box office viability have always tempered with such is the harsh reality of film as a business rather than an art So it was that tax incentives and government funding in Australia worked to alleviate the joint artistic and commercial pressures on the film industry Individual works were hence heralded or excoriated careers were cut short or taken up internationally and the money men kept looking for a product that would appeal The tension between film as national self expression commercial product and a business with a replenishing talent base thanks to Australia s two dominant film schools Swinburne and the AFTRS resulted in a dynamic undercurrent to the making of Australian film back stories hitherto uncollected in book form
