ABSTRACT

This study examined the perception of cataloguing and classification practices in academic libraries in South-West Nigerian and what effect the automated cataloguing process has on manual cataloguing in the for libraries. The study population comprised 110 library professional and paraprofessional personnel working in the cataloguing section of the five federal and state university libraries in South-West Nigeria. Trial enumeration technique was used to randomly select the study population for this study. Data for this study was collected using questionnaire. A 5-point Likert scale were used with 1-3 representing 'strongly agree', 'agree', 'undecided', 'disagree' and 'strongly disagree' respectively to elicit information from the respondents. A total of 110 copies of the questionnaires were distributed to the respondents. 82 copies of the questionnaires were received and valid for analysis. Data were analyzed using charts, table, frequencies, percentage, mean and standard deviation.

The result of the study find out that automation is changing positively the way bibliographic details are being created and displayed. Cataloguing is now quicker with the automated system and that automated system is preferred to the manual system. The study highlighted various benefits of cataloguing automation such as automation improve interpersonal relationship, saves time, easy feedback from library user, etc.
