Abstract

The construction industry offers employment to about one hundred eighty million people worldwide. The modern economy is based on the evolution and development of the construction industry due to the demand for urbanisation and industrialisation. Despite the significant improvement in the construction industry, this sector is considered risky then challenging; and faces the most vulnerable and hazardous work environment. The launch of Occupational Safety and Health (OSH) of ISO 45001- 2018 International Standards is inevitable for construction organisations to provide safety, healthy and preventive environment on construction sites to the labours. OSH in construction is a globally important concern, the same goes for Libya. There are several issues ranging from the lack of attention to OSH from the construction company, plus, the increasing cost and time for safety equipment and maintaining safety culture, thus leading to poor workers' performance. These factors lead to low-quality construction work. Resolving problems of OSH practices requires enhancing the requisite knowledge, skills, attributes, and a wealth of experience to lead and manage projects successfully. A study was carried out for adapting the Organisational OSH Performance Practice in Libya Construction Companies. This paper highlights a quantitative research approach to the adaptation of OSH measurement performance in a construction company. The data was collected from 75 respondents of construction practitioners in Libya using structured questionnaires. The study revealed the factors between the OSH regulation in ISO 45001-2018 and OSH organisational performance, subsequently, the intricacies of the relationship will nurture the development of a valid model and recommendations regarding the success of construction projects in Libya. In conclusion, implementing OSH can better manage and measure construction projects and improve the organisational OSH performance.

1. INTRODUCTION

Globally, the construction industry plays a vital role in contributing to the countries' development and economic growth. It is reported that the construction sector provides about 3-5% of the Gross Domestic Product (GPD) (Alaloul et al., 2021; Musarat et al., 2021; Shurrab et al., 2019). Furthermore, the construction division has a crucial positive effect on society by employing about 180 million people worldwide and providing jobs to around 7% of the world's workforce (Alhanouti & Farrell, 2021; Shaikh et al., 2020). The modern economy depends on the building industry's evolution and growth due to urbanisation and industrialization demands. Despite the substantial development in the construction business, this sector is regarded as unsafe and difficult, and it faces the most vulnerable and hazardous work environments compared to other industries. Inadequacies in safety are a worldwide issue that led to expensive losses. According to (Collaborators, 2020), inadequate safety management accounts for around 1.53 million deaths worldwide. This high number of workplace accidents is estimated to have generated $2.88 trillion in global gross domestic product (GDP) losses (Adei et al., 2021).
