Intertextuality and Prestige Advertising: A discursive-semiotic analysis of Australian TV advertisements Christian Wöller, 2001-11-20 Thesis M A from the year 2001 in the subject English Language and Literature Studies Linguistics grade 1 7 A LMU Munich Institute for English Philology language English abstract Introduction 1 1 Foreword Intertextuality is a term that has often been discussed in the linguistic analysis of literature texts More recently it has become a popular term in media research especially the analysis of advertisements But what about Intersemioticity Intersemioticity is a term that was coined only recently by Lipka personal note Like intertextuality it deals with the relationship of texts to each other but refers not only to textual and verbal messages but also to non verbal information such as pictures or sounds It can simply be seen as a web of references that link the textual visual and aural elements of a primary message with textual visual and aural elements from other messages Even the interaction of semiotic modes within a message marks a form of intertextuality which can be referred to as intra semioticity In modern TV advertising both intra and intersemioticity play an important role as visual and verbal information continually overlap each other and consequently can no longer be defined as independent referential systems Prestige is a relatively broad term that according to the Cambridge Online Dictionary dictionary cambridge org is used to refer to the respect and admiration given to someone or something usually because of a reputation for high quality success or social influence In advertising it is often associated with luxurious goods or prestige items such as expensive cars or watches but also with personal prestige Celebrated public characters often advertise for a product which enhances the value of both the product and sometimes the celebrity In a more cultural context prestige refers to the respect and admiration that is given to a cultural group because of its positive values and qualities In the opinion of most Australians Australian culture stands for friendliness liberal thinking personal independence naturalness openness good humour sportsmanship nature loving and national pride Advertisers who wish to boost the sales of an Australian product to Australian consumers often address their target group by making references to these highly estimated national characteristics See how They Tick Anthony Pecotich, Robert R.
