Defining Self-Help

Help from without is often enfeebling in its effects, but help from within invariably invigorates. [111]

Self-help behavioral treatments encompass those strategies designed to moderate or extinguish substance use or associated negative consequences. Inherent within the definition are two fundamental and essential properties of self-help: (1) the strategies are self-initiated and self-maintained, and (2) the strategies do not involve enduring relationships with professional care providers, professional supervision or authority, or illicitly obtained prescription drugs. Under this umbrella fall techniques such as non-prescription substance substitution or replacement, bibliotherapy, helplines, spirituality and mindfulness, and Internet resources, as well as a variety of self-help groups. Each technique ranges in cost, intensity, availability, and effectiveness depending on the type and severity of the addiction. This chapter begins with a brief review of relevant literature related to self-help in addiction including reviews of natural recovery [113] and processes of change described
