

from the circumstantial expedients of politics'. It is exactly because that precept was followed by one of the subtlest Conservative statesmen of his generation that the 1944 Education Act wound up forty years of controversy and still remains on the statute book thirty-five years later.

It will be a test of the Conservative government, which has now come to power, that it understands the need to create that sense of 'pacifying distance', even when dealing with those subjects on which emotions have been most strongly, and most justifiably, aroused.

Christianity and the World Order (Reith Lectures 1978)

By Edward Norman OUP 1979 105 pp. £3.50

Christian Faith and Political Hopes: A reply to E. R. Norman

Epworth 1979 155 pp. £1.75

The kindest thing to be said about the Reith Lectures is that they were a major opportunity missed. For the first time the BBC were persuaded to present a Christian speaker with a Christian theme. They chose in Dr Norman a deeply committed Christian of conservative inclination and an urbane and respected scholar. How then did it go wrong?

In the first place simply because Norman did not elect to present his faith. The name of Christ is scarcely mentioned until the final lecture. But to the Christian Christ is the alpha as well as the omega, the beginning as well as the end, the Word of God in creation, inspiring the prophets, incarnate in Jesus, empowering through the Spirit who is the Spirit of Christ, mighty in the final judgement. In place of a Christian analysis Norman offers rather shoddy sociology. He presents political analysis of those he charges with political analysis. Those whom he attacks accept Christ as the Lord of History, and are wrestling with him to find his nature and his name; Norman shows no signs of doing so. He suggests that the business of the church is liturgy and other-worldliness. But Christianity is an incarnational religion. Arnold Bowman once said to Charles Raven 'One part of mankind sees this world as something to be escaped from, another as something to be exploited, and only a minority of us Christians see it as something to be redeemed.'

Secondly, as James Mark shrewdly comments in an essay in the Epworth rejoinder, Norman's critique is largely negative; David Jenkins describes him as critical and complaining. The result is, as Fred Moorhouse said once of Reinhold Niebuhr, that instead of Good News about God we receive Bad News about Men.

Thirdly, Norman's critique is unclear and unfair. It is unclear because he sometimes seems to be saying that the more vocal Christians in politics are politically naïve, though as John Kent says in the course of
