

conclude that more research is needed to determine the economic benefits of large urban areas and their more efficient use.

Finally there is a section describing the economic organisation of the building industry and the construction process in which the authors discuss the fluctuations in activity due to the building cycle and government policy.

The general treatment of these subjects is for the most part descriptive but in some chapters such as those which describe the housing market and the development process, the authors analyse the situation using economic models.

Property investment is shown in its proper perspective and although the types of property investment and their yields are described in general terms this does not detract from an interesting and readable introduction to the working of the property market.

In trying to relate town planning and land values the authors are on more difficult and controversial ground and this section is based on the proposition that the town plan which would lead to the highest aggregate of land values is the best economically. Even if this is true is it practical to invite the planner to assess the aggregate of land values over such a wide area? In the light of this proposition it is interesting that the authors are unable to decide whether green belt policy is good or bad economically and they also draw attention to the view, widely held, that high land values and traffic congestion have resulted from the under allocation of land in the first development plans resulting from the Town and Country Planning Act 1947.

These chapters on planning and land values should be contrasted with the more direct approach advocated by Reynolds in his recent book Economics, Town Planning and Traffic.

Like general economics, land economics is concerned with the allocation and use of scarce resources but it is also concerned with the direct influence of all those special factors which affect land, its use and control and whose complexity can be judged by the burden of recent legislation alone.

This book which is written primarily from the view point of the economist does not attempt the more detailed and integrated analysis which is necessary in an advanced study but for University students or candidates for the professional examinations it provides a general introduction to the economics of urban land use. It should also stimulate further interest in the problems which are discussed.

The British Building Industry: Four Studies in Response and Resistance to Change
by Marian Bowley, Cambridge University Press, 1966, pp. 488, 70/-

A leading economist has recently maintained that the examination of the building industry should be concerned with 'the particular and less of the transcendental'. Professor Bowley's book is, in the early stages, an example of 'the particular' but later sections move into broader areas and assess the implications of the relationships existing between the main parties and organisations in the industry.

In the first part of the book, she considers the emergence of modern building methods, highlighting the respective rates of development of steel and concrete structures; within this framework the intricacies of the co-ordination of design and construction are also examined. The following two sections are of particular interest in the light of present day developments: Part 2 assesses the benefits and drawbacks of non-traditional methods of building for houses and schools in the early post-war period. The analysis points to the importance of government pressure and encouragement towards the use of cost analysis methods, the
