

Commuting in British Columbia: Annotated Bibliography

Chowdhury, T. A., Scott, D. M., & Kanaroglou, P. S. (2013). Urban form and commuting efficiency: A comparative analysis across time and space. Urban Studies 50(1), 191-207. <https://doi.org.ezproxy.kpu.ca/2443/10.1177/0042098012452324>

Chowdhury et al. (2013) explore the relationship between the form of a city and the efficiency of commuting. The study compared commuting efficiency rates in three Canadian cities: Halifax, Nova Scotia; Hamilton, Ontario; and Vancouver, British Columbia. The authors found that even though commuting is generally more efficient in cities where there is a balanced jobs-to-housing distribution, this may not be the case with Vancouver: even though people in Vancouver may live closer to their workplaces than in Halifax, their commute has not decreased. The article covers new ground in that it uses a modified form of a quantitative methodology known as Brotchie's triangle. The authors claim that this approach provides a way to look at a city's commuting patterns with respect to urban form, but they also admit that it may not be the best measure of comparing the distance between jobs and housing. This article provides a clear contrast to the article by Hodson and Vannini (2007), who have used a qualitative, ethnographically-based strategy to explore the lives of a specific set of BC commuters.

Hodson, J., & Vannini, P. (2007). Island time: The media logic and ritual of ferry commuting on Gabriola Island, BC. Canadian Journal of Communication, 32(2), 261-275. <https://doi.org/10.22330/cjc.2007v32n2a1910>

The authors explore the notion of time as it is experienced in a bodily way by residents of Gabriola Island as they commute to and from Nanaimo on the MV Quinsam ferry. Using ethnographic methods such as participant observation and interviewing as well as writing in a narrative way, they attempt to convey how a sense of time is shaped by the rituals of Gabriola Islanders' everyday commuting and the idiosyncracies of ferry
