

Should the UK have a codified constitution?

- It has been suggested the UK constitution should be codified for many years. The Lib Dems have been a key supporter of this change but have not been able to win power alone.
- Two reasons provide an obstacle to this change:
 1. Major parties disagree about the nature and content of codification.
 2. Codified constitution would affect the powers of the government places tighter checks in place and limit the power of the executive.

In favour of codification	Against codification
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Clarity – since constitutional rules are entrenched in a single document, citizens know how power is distributed and what the limits are to the power of political institutions. Thus, there is less confusion. • Limiting government – a codified constitution is likely to prevent the possibility of an elective dictatorship as it would end parliamentary sovereignty and higher law would protect the constitution from interference from the government of the day. • Safeguarding the constitution – if codified, it would be difficult for a short time government to amend the constitution for its own benefit. • Rights – a codified constitution would clearly state the rights of citizens and help prevent government from abusing these rights. This would usually occur through an entrenched Bill of Rights. • Strong judicability – such a constitution could be effectively protected or “policed” by the senior judges. Thus, they would ensure that the constitution is properly upheld by other public bodies since they are neutral and impartial. • Modernity – a codified constitution would bring the UK in line with existing modern democracies. Moreover, if codified, amendments and developments would be made in a measured, rational manner with democratic debate. 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Flexibility – an uncodified constitution can be easily changed and so evolve and adapt to changing circumstances. Thus, it is ‘organic’ to change with natural developments. E.g. passing Anti-Terrorism legislation after 9/11 and responding with works of constitutional authority to the 2010 hung parliament. A codified constitution, conversely is rigid as higher law is harder to change than statute law. • Strong government – a codified constitution might limit the power of the government too much, making them ineffective. It also prevents government shutdowns seen in the USA. E.g. 2013 Shutdown over Obamacare. • Accountability – governments cannot hide behind an uncodified constitution to justify their inactivity, thereby making them more accountable. • Legalistic – codified constitutions are only best understood by lawyers and judges, as opposed to uncodified ones that are historic and organic in character. • Political bias – written constitutions are biased by nature because they enforce one set of values or principles over others. Thus, they are not above politics as they create more conflict than resolve it. • Unnecessary - instead of a codified constitution it is better to limit government power, enhance democracy and strengthen checks and balances to prevent an over mighty government. • Weak judicability – judges are not the best people to police the constitution as they are unelected and socially unrepresentative. • Conservative pragmatism – Social Darwinism dictates that if institutions stood the test of time, like the constitution, it should not be changed – “if it ain’t broke, don’t fix it”
