

ing to the attack, closed their eyes and sang the exploits of their forefathers. The impetuosity with which they made the attack was almost irresistible. The women of the tribes fought with intrepidity, and, though not armed, rendered essential service to their husbands by grasping with and aiding the arms of their enemies. The weapons which they used in battle were swords, battle-axes, bows and arrows, and long spears. These were formed of brass, of stone, and of flint. Flints, edged with flint, were common weapons, and little arrow heads have been found near the mouth of the desert. For defence, they had a target made of wood, and occasionally one made of tortoise, covered with leather, and studded with brass nails. War was of brass and stone, and small flint heads of arrows, have been found in various parts of the desert, several of which are represented in the accompanying plate.

The next objects which attract attention are the Forts of the various people. As might be expected, these strongholds are generally found occupying the tops of the highest hills. They are generally oval, sometimes circular, but their shape is much to depend very much on the contour of the mountain, or the part where the strongholds is placed. The country is full of hill-forts, but it is not easy to determine, with certainty, the period of their erection. The original forts were frequently taken possession of by the Spaniards, and their shape altered. The Romanized Guatemal and Otzabal, when they defended their land against the invasions of the Mexicans and Chichimecas,
