ABSTRACT

Human communication is organized in diverse ways in verbal art in particular. Oral literary forms reflect unusual use of language at both literary and semantic levels. In this paper, the researcher looks into language of folkloric verbal expression by exploring sense relations and literary devices in selected proverbs and riddles. The study is geared by two theories such as Expressive Critical Approach and Literary Analysis as a Scientific Method. Discussion demonstrates that both types of oral tradition embody essential lexico - semantic and literary aspects taken as a pool from which language learners can draw to enhance not only language proficiency but also figures of speech. Both proverbs and riddles reflect the use of foregrounded language. They are effective means to nurture language understanding and its use in human day to day communication.

INTRODUCTION

Language is an invaluable tool for human beings to thrive socially, culturally, economically and politically. It is a tool for art while the later is its end. Language is a means of exchange of thoughts, a means for people's interactions. As reviewed in his twentieth century study, Stewart (1979) recalls that human daily lives are filled with reckoning, lining up or deciding in terms of discoursing on what should have been said and how, thus discussing on a means to an end and vice versa. Accordingly, the knowledge of the world and knowledge of a word are interdependent (Cann, 2011) on a par with human beings acting to one another by interacting verbally or in writing. In oral tradition, conversations take place as a result of successful use of language for communication purposes. Language is therefore organised in diverse ways at both literary and semantic levels. This being, folkloric forms such as proverbs and riddles reflect unusual use of language calling the audience to pay particular attention to where the speaker lays emphasis while speaking. Metaphor and other literary devices, without exception to repetition devices, are generally used in short oral literary form in a foregrounded way, sometimes challenging the audience in understanding a thought that is expressed. In this vein, the challenger and proposer or speaker - hearer relationship imposes an important place in this discussion. In oral art, both challenger and proposer are two inherent conditions for language use to burgeon.

Research propounds that there is nothing that does exist out of the universe, art, the author and audience (Purohit, 2013). That is why critical analysis of words and how they are used in a speech now matters for the audience to understand what is meant. Words utilization and what they mean then impose some room in literary studies, oral tradition forms in particular. As part of forms of oral tradition, riddles and proverbs are therefore a good pool for the study of language and art. Those literary forms do have some common features among themselves. Not only do they make language to burgeon but also enable culture awareness. Jordan (2022) and Finsegan (2012) confirm that riddles and proverbs are closely related types of oral forms embodying symbolic or veiled expressions based on common experience associated with younger and older people's life. Definitely, the performance of proverbs and riddles robotizes language use among the same speech community. Literary devices and semantic relations explored concurrently have a twofold significance for both linguists and literary critics.

While literary texts display distinctive vocabulary used unusually, the linguistic study of literature addresses the ways in which language is differently organized in verbal art or
