Edson Armi,1983 For nearly a century archaeologists and art historians studying the great third abbey at Cluny Cluny III have agreed on a set of abstract principles including its spontaneous generation or revolutionary character and posited an overseeing genius who selected from non local sources In a sweeping revision of that position this book argues that Cluny Ill is the building where regional masons of different traditions first combined their talents to develop a new design and further maintains that the artisans responsible for the masonry of Cluny Ill also created its sculpture Professor Armi reaches these conclusions through a painstaking analysis of archaeological evidence such as masons marks and a careful hand analysis of the site s sculpture allowing observation of both individual and general design changes turning points and stylistic trends As a result of his investigation of the major Burgundian structures of the period Cluny V zelay Paray le Monial Anzy le Duc Perrecy les Forges etc the author has established a new chronology for the architecture of the region He also has identified the careers of the major artists who carved the portal and capital sculpture His research has even disproved the traditional assumption that sculpture was carved in situ for his evidence reveals that finished pieces were fitted into the masonry at Cluny III and elsewhere By focusing on the work of individual masons and on progressive alterations in architectural detail the author has broken with the method of his predecessors but there is ample support for both his methods and his conclusions in the book s 400 illustrations In his use of macrophotography alone Armi has added a valuable new methodological tool for the comprehension of both architecture and sculpture but his most important contribution to the field lies in showing that by working together two local groups of masons merged their separate traditions to create a magnificent synthesis the Cluniac High Romanesque style The Mediæval Church Architecture of England
