

Job Interviews with Multiple Rounds: Capitalist Strategies in an Uncertain Economy

Christian Valentin, EdD

Abstract

Should policies or even laws be established that require companies or institutions to set a deadline for informing candidates of the results of their job interviews? How can an educational institution require four to five rounds of interviews for a traditional teaching position? Nevertheless, that is only part of the problem: What if, after four to five rounds of interviews, the institution never informs the candidate whether or not he or she will be hired? Suppose institutions have all the benefits and legal ability to do so. What is the difference between going to a local store and stealing something just because you first wanted to ensure the merchandise worked before paying for it? Teachers, mechanics, accountants, and nurses not only they are exchanging their knowledge and skills for an income, but they are also selling their lifetime. However, the main idea here is to establish how long an institution should take to acknowledge whether or not the candidate is suitable for the position.

The perspective of a Hispanic teacher looking for a job in New York City

In Western societies, we usually consider the metaphor that TIME IS MONEY. Although money is not always time, in general terms, we can agree that in a city like New York, the available time a person has during a day can be equivalent to a certain extent to the money he/she can or could earn. For example, renting a studio apartment in Manhattan, New York, can cost approximately $5,000 per month (Frank, 2012). An individual without a roommate would earn at least $65,000 annually to survive in the Big Apple. However, institutions expect the individual to use up to 10, even 20 hours (unpaid) of their time during two months to prepare for and attend job interviews. At first, I thought this was a phenomenon peculiar to some individuals. However, when I started looking on the Internet, I realized that these were not anomalies in the hiring process. As a teacher with a doctorate in education, I started looking for a job in Manhattan, New York City. After a couple of weeks, on February 8th, I received an email from an educational institution that stated:

"We received your resume through the Indeed application portal. If you are interested in the position, please reply to this email with a cover letter and listed salary expectations by Friday, February 10th."
