Summary

Despite unprecedented advances in science and technology for health in the developed world, the developing economies are increasingly left behind. One way to bring these advances to these economies is through the use of information and communication technology (ICT), also known as eHealth. The reach of ICT, both via Internet access and mobile phones, is increasing substantially¹. Additional solutions will involve advancing education for workers² and building science capacity.³ Indeed, a number of initiatives in many countries have been undertaken.⁴ Some successful programs have involved partnerships with academic centers in developed countries⁵.

Part of the solution to advancing ICT for health care in developing economies will be to provide ICT applications and education for their optimal use. There are many questions to answer, and a sub-question to them all is what lessons can be learned from ICT and eHealth in the developed world? Among these questions are:

- What are the profiles (i.e., training, competencies) for the workforce needed to lead eHealth projects?
- What are the valid methods for quantifying workforce needs in developing countries?
- How can we account for and be respectful of variations in local perceptions (culture, language, health care systems, existing resources, etc.) in developing countries?

In developed economies there is increasing evidence that ICT can improve the quality and safety of health care while reducing its cost^{6,7}. There is also growing evidence for the value that a well-trained ICT workforce can offer.⁸ A growing number of educational programs are emerging to meet the need to train such individuals, from graduate education⁹ to shorter courses, such as the AMA 10x10 initiative.^{10,11}

Certainly, any approach to addressing the needs for ICT knowledge and workforce development must focus on the needs of different individuals in the health care system of these countries. This includes:

- Citizens/patients – basic health literacy, use of technology for improving health and interacting with health care and public health systems;
- Health care and public health professionals – use of ICT to improve care, interact with citizens/patients, and obtain education;
- Health ICT (informatics) professionals – development, implementation, and evaluation of ICT to improve health, health care, and public health;
- Health leaders and policymakers – optimal decision making for investment and usage of health ICT.

How do we determine the needs and solutions? The process must be data-driven, using existing research capabilities. As needs will likely differ among countries, cultures, and political and economic factors, the solutions may differ by country or region. There must be a meeting of the minds among those familiar with understanding of local health priorities as well as ICT capacity and of those who are familiar with ICT and what solutions have been found to be most effective in these settings. From this will emerge solutions for appropriate ICT implementation and education of stakeholders, including the ICT workforce.

Three areas related to determining health informatics workforce needs in developing economies are discussed: eHealth applications that are most prominent in developing economies and their barriers, including workforce; what is
