

Mary maneuvered her car up the same hillside, instructed by Lance. The greatest bike chase of all time and he wasn't in on it.

Above the rooftops, Elliott led his party readily to the hidden communitarian. "There . . ." E.T. pointed with his finger.

Ull-lyp-lyp

The communitarian hummed. As Elliott approached it, a sudden beam of brilliant lavender light broke over him. He froze and looked at E.T., who dropped onto the light with him, and together they looked up.

The Great Ship was overhead, soft lights glowing. Elliott stared at the beautiful vehicle, drinking in the greatness of its power. It was E.T. multiplied a millionfold, the greatest bright-light the world had ever seen. He turned toward E.T.

E.T.'s eyes had grown bigger, too, filling with the sight of the beloved mother ship, Queen of the Milky Way. He looked at his friend who had helped him to call across an insurmountable distance. "Thank you, Elliott . . ." His voice had become stronger already . . .

In that moment he saw the willow-creature enter the dining, and he gazed at her in silence. Certe sat toward him. "Here's your flower," she said, holding out the gemstone. He lifted her into his arms. "B. Good."

A shadow moved at the edge of the dining, and the sound of jingling keys filled the night. E.T. quickly set Certe down. He turned to Elliott and held out his hand. "Come."

"Yes," Elliott said.

E.T. embraced the boy, and felt the cosmic loneliness run through him as deep as any he'd ever felt. He reached Elliott's forehead. "I'll be right here," he said, fingers glowing.

Then he walked up the gangplank. The inner light of the Great Gem glowed above him, and he felt the millionfold strength of its awareness lighting in him and his heart, like Elliott's, had filled not with loneliness but with love.

He went into the misty light, with his gemstone.
