Abstract

This paper reviews the digital divide in Western Europe, as well as policy options for combating that divide. While age, income and gender are significant predictors of the digital divide in Western Europe, geography plays a crucial role. The countries in Southern Europe have less computer and Internet penetration than their Northern European counterparts. The paper then discusses four policy options for combating the divide, suggesting that the most effective solution would be private/public partnerships.

Keywords: digital divide, diffusion, Internet, policy

Introduction

There is no question that the "digital divide" – the unequal access to computers and the Internet caused by such social and economic factors as gender, income, race and geography – poses long-term problems for a number of nations across the world. It has become increasingly clear that the ability to use and apply digital information is one of the key skills necessary for future economic mobility, particularly in developing nations. True economic and social progress may not be as real or as sustainable when large numbers of people are left out from receiving its benefits. So important has the digital divide become worldwide that the major advanced industrial countries (known as the "G8" countries) have developed a "dot force" to develop solutions for these technological disparities. (BBC Online, 2000).

When looking at the problem from a global perspective, the digital divide takes two forms. The first is the national digital divides within a country of the world. Considerable discussion has taken place in such countries as the United States, Canada, and Australia to find ways to insure their citizens have access to the Internet.

The second digital divide is the international one between the "information-rich" and the "information-poor" countries. The international digital divide is based largely on the vast economic disparities between the wealthier, industrialized nations and the poorer, developing nations. For example, high-income countries with 16% of the world's population have 90% of the world's Internet hosts. The United States has more computers than the rest of the world combined (BBC Online, 2000).

In this paper, we are first going to apply diffusion theory to the understanding of how patterns of technology adoption tend to be unevenly spread, and what factors affect that process. Secondly, we examine the digital divide as it currently exists in Western Europe – the region of the world that is only behind North America in terms of being "wired." Third, from the experience of attempts to correct the digital divide in the United States, we discuss four possible options that Western Europe could pursue to correct their digital divide. Finally,
